Every graduate student has been through the same process: that they have to squeeze something out and put it into his thesis, which is a process full of more frustration than accomplishment. I believe that each of us has a story to tell about the pain-ridden thesis writing. Every now and then we are set back by the bottleneck, or lose track of the thought in many complicated theories while doing the research. Then we doubt ourselves about the writing ability, and even feel a compulsion to delete all words on the computer screen after finishing each chapter. Ultimately, we complete the thesis of our own. This is the time we can actually be proud of ourselves, and the time to give thanks.

My greatest gratitude would be dedicated to my advisor Dr. Yauling Hsien and Dr. Yin-I Chen, who are kind enough to give instructions on my thesis and offer valuable suggestions many a time. I also have a heartfelt thank to Dr. Chien-chi Liu, for helping me out on many occasions though he does not need to. And I have a genuine appreciation to my friends and my fellow classmates. They are the ones who you can depend on and consult with. Their company is essential in the lonely thesis writing process.

Lastly, since every one tends to thank their family, I thank my family too. Though they do not fully realize what exactly a thesis is, they give me support for simply being there. I give full credit to them for that.
