My journey as a graduate student will be finished here, with this thesis, and with the things beyond this thesis. In these three years, I have not only learned the knowledge of literature but also experienced the life with literature that I always dream about. And here, I want to give my warmest thanks to the people who have made my dream come true—I would like to thank all of the professors who have taught me, for each of you leads me closer to literature and reveals numerous aspects of literature to me—thank Professor Brian Phillips, for your interesting way of teaching always makes literature more colorful; thank Professor Lee Hsiu-chuan, for your consideration and inspirational way of discussing novels—it is you, who has inspired me to write this thesis. I want to thank my classmates too, Ashley, Joanna, Ginger, Joyce, Brenda, Jenny and Alice, for each of you accompanies me through the graduate-student journey: through each anxious day before the deadline for handing in papers, through each defense we make for our favorite writers, and through each day we share with each other.

Furthermore, I want to thank my family and my old friends, especially Grandma BinBin and Great King Yao, for their love and friendship support me throughout the difficulties of my life and lead me to learn how to face the life with positive attitude.

Finally, I would like to extend my heart-felt my adviser, Professor Erick Heroux. My becoming your advisee might be an accident, but it is the most fortunate accident I have ever had. Thank you for your consideration, your attentiveness and every suggestion you have made, all of which have made my work possible.
